

1. Finnart Oil terminal, Loch Long

So called as it sits next to an Oil Terminal however the car park is generally only used by divers at the weekend and is right next to the dive site. The site has good access and a gradual decrease in depth making it an ideal training area. The main feature of this site is a spectacular 'A' frame structure which is the wreckage of a pier that was blown up years ago. It is covered with anemones and there is plenty to explore. It is a great training site due to easy access and gradual slope to 20m. Slight current can be experienced but it is really a problem. Only down side is that it can get busy. Even relatively local dive clubs stop here to save the drive to loch Fyne!
